HEY LITTLE GIRL, BEND DOWN HERE, I WANT TO TELL YOU SOMETHING.

WHATA FUNNY LITTLE MAN!!

Suave Ray Cardell, known to few as the Master Key, shifted his legs as he turned to Roger Benton, head of the Benton Trucking Corporation.

"Accidents, Ray, they're ruining me," Benton said quietly. "Seven trucks smashed, the drivers killed or hurt, and the cargoes destroyed. My customers are deserting me, one by one."

"Hold on!" Ray interrupted, his face tense and his eyes gleaming. "What about the one that smacks your outfit?"

"That's 'the hitch,'" the trucking head answered. "It's the same truck all the time—but, there's never a driver in it. Just a mass of solid steel that disappears after the accident."

"You mean every accident has been by the same driverless truck?" Ray questioned. "What about the license number? The police can trace . . ."

Benton broke in quickly. "As yet, it has never appeared with a driver or license plates on it."

"Roger," Ray said softly, but with determination, "I'm going to try a hand at trapping this mysterious truck for you."

. . . . Late that night, a husky black caped figure walked up to the platform of the Benton Trucking Corporation's warehouse. He handed a card to the loading foreman.

The foreman pointed to a huge overland truck. "That's the truck. Get going!"

. . . . Hours flew by as Ray sat at the wheel. Nothing but dark countryside, broken by the lights of a few passing cars, met his eyes.

"Maybe I picked the wrong route," he mused. "Can't be, Roger said this is the only one that an accident hasn't occurred on."

On and on the truck rumbled, its glaring headlights piercing the stygian darkness ahead. Suddenly, a huge form loomed up before him. He swerved his truck, but the oncoming vehicle swerved, too, as if determined to crash.

Ray tensed, and soon the peremptory look of the Master Key crossed his face. He shifted his head and from his right eye a blue beam shot out. It penetrated the hood of the onrushing truck. A faint explosion, and the huge vehicle stopped. The Master Key jammed on the brakes and leaped out. Running to the cab of the truck, he looked inside, but saw no driver or identification.

Sensing something, the Master Key turned his head and saw the lights of an approaching car.

Quickly, the Master Key hid in the shadows of the truck. The newcomer screeched to a halt. A trio of shadows emerged from the car and made their way to the truck.

"Somebody's been monkeying with the truck," one of them said.

The Master Key braced himself and dived full smack into the three of them.

"Ouch!" came a muffled cry.

"I'll stop him!" another cried.

A revolver gleamed in the dim light. The Master Key turned his head and again the weird blue light flashed out of his eye. The controlled ray hit the gun barrel and it exploded to bits.

"Owwwwww!" came the agonizing wail.

"It's the Master Key!" a terrified voice cried.

"Let's get out of here!" another broke in.

They tried, but ran head on into the fists of the Master Key. Dull thuds and moans followed, as the caped figure slashed away unmercifully. One after another, the men slumped to the ground.

. . . . Later, at the office of the Benton Trucking Corporation, Ray Cardell faced his friend, Roger Benton, once again. This time his voice was soft and calm.

"It was the old remote control idea, Roger," he said. "A truck, electrically controlled by a switch in the thug's car. They followed closely behind and guided it into your trucks."

"That clears the mystery up, Ray," Benton said. "But, I don't understand why my loading foreman isn't here today."

Ray smiled. "I don't think he'll show up any more. You see, he's the owner of a few trucks under another name. He conceived the mystery truck idea. After the accidents, his agents easily persuaded your clients to do business with his company."

NOW, IT'S MY TURN!

SOMETHING FOR THE KIDS

"I'd be better off dead," moaned Julie Rogoff to himself, as he sat behind the wheel of his cab. "Can't make a nickel," he cried. "It's been like this for weeks. Cripes, my wife and kids will starve to death."

His mind began to whirl. "Better off dead—Better off dead." Again and again, the thought spun through his mind.

"Let's see," he said, "they'll collect my insurance policy. That will help them eat for some time. The kids will miss me. But why should they? I never did anything unusual for them. Now, at least, I'll commit suicide and they'll collect enough money to eat for a year."

Suddenly, Julie cocked his head back. "Mustn't let the insurance company know I committed suicide. They don't pay off on suicides. Let's see, I'll drive the cab off a big hill and no one will be the wiser."

Julie turned the key and started the car. He began to drive uptown. "Hmm," he grinned, "it will be nice rolling down them big hills in the Bronx. I'll die where I was born, right in the Bronx. Heck, that almost sounds successful."

As Julie turned the corner and headed out of the Times Square business section, suddenly, the cracking of revolvers filled the air.

The plate glass window of the bank near the corner came crashing to the ground. In a flash, Julie realized that the bank was being robbed.

Out of the bank's doorway raced three gangsters with smoking revolvers, while a fourth one held a money bag which contained the bank's deposits.

Julie spotted a policeman, with a revolver in his hand, running toward the bank robbers. Suddenly, a fusillade of machine gun bullets roared from the front of the getaway car, and the patrolman fell to the sidewalk.

The gangsters jumped into the car and began to drive off.

"Sons of Satan!" roared Julie, as he jammed his foot down on the gas pedal of his taxi. "The dirty killers," he screamed, "I'm going to stop them. Cripes, this is as good a way as any to commit suicide."

His car was speeding toward the getaway car that was pulling away from the curb. One of the gangsters spotted him.

"Look out!" cried one of the mugs, "that cab's coming at us."

Another rat grabbed a machine gun and sent a barrage of bullets into the taxi. Julie felt the hot burning lead rip into his shoulder. He gritted his teeth and kept the car going forward.

The next second, a loud, roaring crash filled the air, as the two cars smashed into each other. The fenders of the cars became embodied within each other, and the two cars turned over and over until they came to a stop. None of the occupants in the cars moved.

.... Julie thought he was dead, "Probably resting in heaven," he mused. He felt something touching his lips. A straw passed between his lips and he felt a cooling sensation, as water came floating into his mouth through the straw.

Julie opened his eyes and saw his wife. "Sarah! Sarah," he cried. "Ain't I dead?"

"Who's dead?" laughed his wife. "You're in a hospital."

"Oh," moaned Julie, as he realized his plans had failed. "NO INSURANCE MONEY," he thought.

"Oh, Julie," he heard his wife sigh, "the children are so proud of you. They keep running around showing the neighbors your pictures that are in the papers. They're always yelling, 'LOOK, MY PAPA'S A HERO.'"

Julie smiled to himself. At least he had made his kids happy, even if he didn't get them food.

"Guess what, Julie," Sarah questioned. "The bank president is giving you a five thousand dollar reward!"

Julie whistled. "That's more than I would have collected on my insurance."

"Your insurance?" Sarah asked. "I secretly cancelled it to buy you the taxi."

OLE FAITHFUL

"Mose," yelled Judge Hale to his colored handy man, "why haven't you sent that old horse to the glue factory, as I told you to last week?"

"Please, boss," cried the old Negro, "Ole Faithful done been on this farm for over twenty-three years. He was born the day my Sammy died over there in France."

"You know, boss," continued the colored man, "that horse is mighty attached to me. Ah once read a story about reincarnation. How dead people come back alive in another animal's body. Somehow, Ah feels like this horse might be my own son."

"Poppycock," yelled the old judge.

"Please, boss," begged the Negro, "that horse is mighty smart. Look," he said, as a shrill whistle came from his mouth. Suddenly a clattering of horse's hooves was heard and across the grounds came Old Faithful in a bee line dash for Rufus.

"See, boss," said the Negro, "every time Ah whistles, he comes straight at me."

"Poppycock," roared the judge again. "Have the truck take him to the depot in the morning and ship him to Birmingham."

"Yas, suh," cried Mose, as tears crept out of the corners of his eyes.

Mose slowly stroked Old Faithful's mane. "Horse," he sniffed, "run around the meadows tonight."

It's gonna be your last day on the farm."

Late that evening, old Judge Hale read the paper on his porch. "Gosh Almighty," he yelled, as he turned the paper and read a news dispatch. "JUDGE THOMAS FOUND MURDERED. JURIST'S EYES BURNED OUT."

"Thomas dead! Murdered!" gasped the judge. "Why, we used to sit on the same bench together. It was Thomas, Blackburn and myself who gave Killer Grange the life sentence together. Yep, that was the day before I retired."

The old judge sighed, "That Thomas was a fine man. Wonder why anybody would want to murder him?"

The judge heard footsteps coming toward him. He looked up and saw Mose.

"What's the matter now?" he roared. "If you're back again to ask me to keep your horse, it's nothing doing. If that horse isn't at the depot in the morning, you can quit your job."

"No suh, boss," said Mose. "Ah came to tell you somebody is outside on the grounds who wants to see you."

It was dark outside and as Hale walked toward the figure, he asked, "What do you want?"

The man remained silent.

Hale, with Mose close behind, came nearer to the man. The indignant judge yelled, "Come, come, what is it?"

The man suddenly removed his hat and at the same time whipped out a gun. "Put up your hands and come over here!" he barked.

"Gosh Almighty," gasped the judge, as he recognized the man. "KILLER GRANGE."

"Yeah!" snapped the killer, as he stepped forward and knocked Hale to the ground.

Grange quickly turned to Mose and then took a small acetylene torch out of his pocket and lit it.

"What are you going to do with that?" asked Mose.

"Burn the judge's eyes out," he shot back. "I swore I'd do it as soon as I broke out of stir."

Mose whistled shrilly in surprise.

Suddenly, from the meadows, came a clatter of hooves. The killer turned.

"What's that?" he screamed.

Out of nowhere, Old Faithful came crashing through the bushes. The horse did not see the killer until he was upon him, but then it was too late as the powerful legs sent the killer to the ground.

... The next day, Mose was patting Old Faithful.

"Horse," he said, "Judge Hale thinks you are the smartest animal he ever saw. The way you came crashing through the hedge and knocked the killer down, won him over. How could he know you didn't see anything? Only Ah knows you is blind as the eyes on potatoes."
